LEARNING OBJECTIVES

1. To describe the major differences between categorical and inferential/dimensional approaches to conceptualizing personality differences.
2. To differentiate between understanding personality in terms of traits, even conceived as dimensional, versus in terms of intersubjective themes, and to apply that understanding toward a more nuanced formulation of the psychologies of their individual clients.
3. To apply Blatt's anaclitic-introjective polarity to the improvement of their clinical work.
4. To improve their capacity to diagnose paranoid themes and psychotic-level preoccupations in their patients.
5. To make clinical choices that increase their effectiveness with patients who have personality patterns that reflect particular attachment styles.
6. To develop a psychotherapy style appropriate for each client's level and type of personality structure.

SUMMARY

Appreciating the clinical implications of personality differences has been a central concern for psychotherapists since the early part of the twentieth century. Our patients are unique individuals, with specific, personality-related strengths and weaknesses, and although we may focus on a particular "disorder" that any client describes to us, we understand that problem in the context of the person's individuality. Ever since the 1980 neo-Kraepelinian revision of the DSM, personality issues have been relegated to a section of "disorder" categories and described by the presence or absence of observable traits. The diagnosis of categorical personality disorder has also been a topic of ongoing controversy.

Dr. McWilliams will discuss the history of the concepts of personality structure and disorder and their relevance to practice, reviewing ten different psychological lenses through which personality has been viewed (temperament, attachment, observed clinical pattern, defensive structure, affective organization, implicit cognition, drive tendencies, self-definition versus self-in-relation orientation, core relational theme, organizing developmental issue). She will comment on the difficulties of the recent DSM-5 task force, whose members attempted (but failed to achieve) a comprehensive revision of our language for, and underlying assumptions about, disorders of personality. She will explore central tensions between research paradigms and clinical paradigms, between trait-based and theme-based conceptions of personality, and between the assumptions underlying the DSM and those underlying the Psychodynamic Diagnostic Manual, now undergoing its first revision. She will comment on the politics of contemporary mental health and give examples of clinical challenges that are usefully faced via an in-depth understanding of a particular client's personality, whether or not it is "disordered."
